Transient ischemic attacks. Transient ischemic attacks (TIA) can be caused by large and small artery occlusive disease, both atheromatic and atherothrombotic. The clinical presentation can range from abrupt onset of the event to an insidious progression of symptoms. Patients with TIA should be hospitalized for a careful neurologic examination with the aim of identifying reversible causes of symptoms. Patients with high risk factors (such as atrial fibrillation) should undergo immediate and aggressive evaluation. These patients should be hospitalized for anticoagulation and if indicated thrombolytic therapy. Patients with mild symptoms, no risk factors, no prolonged ischemic episodes, and rapid recovery after neurologic examination should be treated as outpatients and monitored for the development of stroke.
