Some 30 years after first appearing on the scene, the topic of neonatal resuscitation is again being addressed. Training in neonatal resuscitation has been available to the medical and nursing communities for almost half a century and, in the last three decades, the recommended approach to resuscitation has changed significantly. The change is due in part to evidence for the use of techniques that have been shown to improve neonatal outcomes. The use of these techniques is dependent on the effective monitoring of outcomes. The primary aim of the proposed study is to determine whether an improvement in the monitoring of neonatal outcomes has occurred during the last decade. In addition to a survey of neonatal outcomes, a sample of neonatal practices that include both intrapartum and inpatient practices will be selected, and surveys of both physicians and nurses who have experience in neonatal resuscitation will be conducted. The results of the survey will be used to develop an instrument for measuring the outcomes of resuscitation. The instrument will be applied in practice settings to determine if practices that seem to be effective can be measured. The skills of physicians and nurses in the management of neonatal resuscitation will also be studied in the selected practices. The results of the study will be incorporated into an educational program and may lead to recommendations for the improvement of neonatal outcomes.

Alzheimer's disease and ageing: Implications for clinical management. Alzheimer's disease (AD) is a progressive neurodegenerative disorder of the brain, which is predominantly observed in elderly people. The pathological hallmark of AD is the deposition of extracellular amyloid plaques, as well as intracellular neurofibrillary tangles, and it is associated with spatial learning and memory dysfunction. To date, there are no disease-modifying treatments that have been approved for clinical use in the management of AD, and palliative treatments have been adopted. Since most patients are already presenting with mild to moderate dementia when they are diagnosed, lifestyle and treatment approaches are mainly focused on reducing risk factors, improving cognition, and maintaining functional independence. Comprehensive geriatric assessments should be considered to guide optimal clinical management for patients with AD and to prevent the occurrence of adverse outcomes.
