Why it matters: Two world leaders came to Trump's defense, and those responses could have a major impact on Trump's relationship with allies in Europe and elsewhere. Trump's trade advisor Peter Navarro defended Trump when he left the summit after speaking to reporters there, but then told me he did not believe the quotes attributed to

Trump were accurate. The story: Politico's Ben White and Eliana Johnson have the first full account of the incident and the three people who best know what happened: Trump's chief strategist Steve Bannon, his son-in-law Jared Kushner, and a top White House aide who is not authorized to speak about the private conversations. European officials told me that Trump had raised an issue with the leaders of Ireland and Belgium after their departure, and referred to them as "those two nasty Germans." "Those guys, you think they're tough? Just wait until you go to trade meetings with them," Trump said, according to people in the room. What they're saying: The two leaders are demanding an apology from Trump, says a person familiar with the issue, and that is why Navarro and others spoke to reporters on their behalf. "They were shocked and offended at the comments... They were insulted because the front office, the national security staff at the White House, is so concerned with this issue and so sensitive to it, they talked to the president directly about it in great detail," said the person, who did not speak on the record because they are not cleared e79caf774b
