I'd like to have a behaviour in my model which is triggered when the model changes a specific variable. I also want to be able to have this behaviour run in parallel. A very simple example would be the case of an agent who update its size from 1 to 2. I want the model to wait for this to happen, then update all model's fields to reflect the change. I know I can make an agent that sets a flag for agents whose behaviour I want to run, but I'd prefer to use a method within the actual model. I know I could create a new agent in a separate file, but I've read that if I import an agent that has a loop in it it won't function properly (I haven't tested this, though). So, what I'm wondering is whether there's a method within NetLogo to allow one of my agents to call my own method? If not, what's the best way of doing this? A: The behaviour construct (and its equivalents in NetLogo for the other back ends) do not allow modification of model parameters. You could create a new agent who updates its size from 1 to 2 (keeping itself as a workspace agent) and then connect its update-size to a (potentially non-parallel) ask-all-agents for size. (Note: asking all agents for a single parameter is possibly not what you want to do, but I was under the assumption it is what you want.)
