initial construction is unknown, but the predominant building materials appear to be wood and adobe. The fact that the interior is relatively small when compared to the overall size of the structure is consistent with an initial construction date sometime in the early eighteenth century. A single four-sided room, a tower surmounting the central room, and a small building that was likely used as a kitchen area are all that remain today. This entry is somewhat difficult to interpret, but it appears to describe a small room with a low ceiling, a door with a huge keyhole, and a kitchen area directly underneath. The wooden walls of this structure are made of tight, thin planks that are attached with a dozen or so thin dowels. Below the kitchen is a low ceiling with a hole that may have been used as a smoke vent. Because of the hole in the ceiling, one is left to conjecture just how or where smoke entered the structure. The building with the lathe is a structure of great interest. This is another of those buildings that appears to be very old, perhaps dating from the 1800s or even earlier. The wooden walls of this structure are made of thin, wide planks that are attached with thick, wooden pegs and sockets. Particular church in 3 to the seventeenth century. It is a large room whose roof is supported by two wooden pillars. A small tower made of stone and wood with a small chapel built inside it overlooks the whole room. The name of the village comes from this structure. This entry is difficult to interpret, and the author himself does not attempt to provide a definitive answer. The author appears
