If economic growth continues at its current pace in the future, the U.S. should be able to meet the job-creation needs of new entrants to the workforce. To meet this challenge, the U.S. government should: build on the recent increases in K-12 educational attainment to increase the relative advantage of producing skilled workers, and continue to promote education, including K-12, to raise the level of human capital in the country. Despite these challenges, the federal government is well positioned to make “mid-term” improvements to its economic and fiscal stance. In recent years, the government has taken advantage of historically low interest rates and significant spending cuts in fiscal year 2013. However, these cuts will need to be extended; only about half of the budget will be subjected to sequestration during the next decade. Here are four proposals that could help policymakers achieve a more balanced fiscal outlook for the next decade. 4. Extend the continuing resolution. The automatic budget cuts that took effect in March were triggered by the failure of Congress and the president to achieve a broader deficit reduction deal. While extending the 2013 continuing resolution would represent a re-suspension of
