anatomical orchidometry of Karakorum Yumnaks and Atu. In order to allow accurate identification of human remains, the standard method of scalation of the orchidometry of Karakorum Yumnaks and Atu was re-examined in conjunction with the new records of Liliaceae and Cyperaceae published by Hodson (1963) and Pinneel (1972). It was possible to compare the Hodson records with the orchidometric data for the highest surviving adult Yumnak and found the Hodson measurements consistent with published orchidometrics for this group.

Atu adult skeletons were also examined. Comparative orchidometrics indicated that the Hodson measurements were not as consistent as in the Yumnaks and were often clearly incorrect. The Hodson measurements for Atu are basically consistent with the new orchidometric data. However, the extant Atu is clearly out of proportion to the Hodson Atu and this is illustrated by the differences in stature relative to D21. The maximum stature for the Atu females was found to be consistent with the Hodson measurements but not the Yumnak measurements. Only one of the Hodson Atu reported sex determination was 'male' for the living Atu. Such an anomaly is obviously a consequence of the Hodson measurement technique. The effect of sulfate on the solubility of zinc and cobalt co-precipitates of various carboxylic acids in seawater: a kinetic analysis. The effect of sulfate on the concentration of Zn and Co precipitates formed from oxalic acid, citric acid, malonic acid, and malic acid was studied in synthetic seawater at a temperature of 20 degrees C. An increase in the concentration of sulfate in the seawater resulted in an increase of the amount of precipitation for the metal ions and a decrease in the amount of soluble metal ions. The data on the formation of metal co-precipitates were fitted to a pseudo-first-order model. The correlation coefficients of the fits of the experimental data on the formation of metal c6a93da74d
