This study aimed at investigating the knowledge and perceptions of community residents living around a large-scale, government-built landfill in Jakarta, Indonesia. Data were collected by means of a survey consisting of eight instruments. In addition, a qualitative in-depth interview was conducted. Findings of the survey revealed that the majority of respondents knew the landfill was situated in the backyard of their communities, despite city governments' efforts to prevent it. Respondents' knowledge regarding the landfill was based on health and environment education received in their school and community days. Furthermore, respondents' perceptions regarding the negative impacts of the landfill were influenced by their previous studies, use of television and media, and word of mouth from community members. This paper provides examples of innovative urban regeneration projects in Indonesia through case studies. In addition, the paper discusses the objectives and initiatives of the Urban Regeneration Program in Indonesia by identifying examples of projects and urban regeneration models in Indonesia. This book is a review of the state-of-the-art and emerging technologies for mitigating the health impacts of air pollution in Southeast Asia, which covers the four Southeast Asian nations—Thailand, Indonesia, Malaysia and the Philippines. This book also covers the range of solutions available from traditional to innovative approaches, from national to regional to local and bottom-up approaches. The book concludes with an assessment of the state of the evidence regarding the health effects of air pollution and the design of effective interventions to mitigate the negative impacts of air pollution.
