Just as there were tides and currents in the air, water and atmosphere, but they were all very slight, not enough to drown someone on land, but enough to swamp a boat. He seemed to think a different sort of gradient was at work in the American political landscape, the mainstream. I felt like he made all sort of bad assumptions, not least that because you could create a college degree, it was not a luxury item. What is not addressed here is the possibility of optimizing a community from within, whether that be via education or social disruption, rather than by becoming reliant on entirely different (and frequently moneyed) systems. That is not a thing that would happen tomorrow, as the government would be taking money from the pockets of individuals for a government project. The government says something like "It's for public security." Now, the way the government usually works, the government can take money from anyone's pockets and use it in any way it pleases. But this is different. So the government decides to fork over all of its (or most of its) money to a private entity. How do they do that? Well, they say "See, this is for public security, look, it's private security." The entity gets the money, and promises the money back if the government turns out to be wrong and the security system is not so secure. This mechanism has been used many times to use security systems to chase down "terrorism". (But note how the term used to define "terrorism" has subtly changed over time. Terrorism used to be defined as violent actions taken by people to achieve some political end; the current definition is violent actions taken by people to achieve any political end; terrorism is no longer just violent and no longer just political, and in any case, we all know the definition of terrorism.) So, they just fork over the money. In return, the private entity gets a contract that defines its obligations. Many times the contract is so vague that it's actually impossible for the private entity to fill; the government simply says "Come up with an easy security system, and we'll pay you if it works." As long as the entity comes up with an easy security system, they can be paid. So the entity creates a security system.

if you've ever worked on software that needed to keep track of times across several geographic areas, then you probably have a sense of why programming with time can be such a pain. the fundamental disconnect is that computer programs prefer events that are perfectly ordered and regular, but the way in which most humans use and refer to time is highly irregular. in this code, you move `print()` and the code used for the generator into `main()`. on line 23, you use the guard clause to make sure that `main()` only runs when this file is executed as a script. this allows other
