In some context, a hacker is a entity that uses a computer system to access or alter information, usually without authorization. In its most common sense, a hacker is a person who uses illegal methods to obtain, alter, steal, or delete data and other information maintained by a computer system. There are many types of hackers, including information technology professionals, system administrators, white-collar criminals, and cyber criminals. The target must generally have some control over the system. To gain access to a computer system, a hacker must obtain the account login information, which will typically be stored in a password file, as well as the name of a user. Once the hacker has this information, they will be able to access the system to see what files are held on the system, where they should be located, and how they should be retrieved. By removing these data or creating new ones, the hacker may also change the contents of the files. From here they can change the user access settings, such as changing the password, and be able to access more data from their accounts. In some situations, a hacker can create a new account and use the account for their own purpose, or to change the settings to the account of the target. They may also obtain login information from a server not connected to a network. Luxury car manufacturers are heavily dependent on the techniques of hackers to identify faults on their devices. Modern thieves acquire information on car hacking by exploiting flaws left by legitimate researchers. Then, thieves prepare to outsmart the existing security systems by modifying their devices, and even attempting to install new code.
