Somatic cells of the nervous system have the ability to proliferate and migrate to form novel tissues. In vivo, they also have the potential to become new neurons or glial cells through neuronal differentiation or glial differentiation, respectively. However, in vitro, in most cases, they show limited differentiation capacity. Activation of the cAMP-dependent signaling pathway facilitates the differentiation of somatic cells and regulates the proliferation of neurons. The cAMP-response element modulator (CREM) is a transcriptional activator involved in cAMP signaling. CREM negatively regulates the cell cycle. We found that adenylate cyclase III (ACIII) was ubiquitously expressed throughout the central nervous system. Also, ACIII was regulated by CREM. Using rat neural stem cells (NSCs) and forskolin, a potent activator of adenylate cyclase, we investigated the effects of CREM on ACIII expression and forskolin-induced neuronal differentiation. ACIII was expressed only in NSCs. Forskolin induced differentiation of NSCs, but not glial differentiation. A submaximal concentration of forskolin induced CREM expression and inhibited ACIII expression. A higher concentration of forskolin induced neuronal differentiation. Also, CREM and ACIII were up-regulated during differentiation of NSCs. These results suggest that CREM plays an important role
