typedef union { char * s[4]; int i; } TestUnion; TestUnion test1; TestUnion test2; int main(void) { test1.i = 0; test2.i = 0; return test1.i == test2.i; }

On gcc, it reports: `$ gcc -std=c99 -Wall -Wextra -pedantic -O3 -c test.c test.c: In function 'main': test.c:13:12: warning: character constant too long for its type [enabled by default] return test1.i == test2.i; ^` Strangely, it does not give a warning if `-pedantic` is not specified. I can reproduce this problem on clang3.6 under the same condition. A: `char` is basically a type containing a sequence of bits, and is not a value type. `char*` means "a pointer to `char`", in the same sense that `int*` means "a pointer to `int`". In this sense, a `char*` can point to any sequence of characters (up to a limit imposed by the C standard), while a `int` can only point to a certain number of ints (typically a multiple of `CHAR_BIT`, which is 32). Then there's the type `char[]`, which decays to `char*`. This is the same situation as `int[]` and `int*`, except that `int[X]` decays to `int ` while `int` does not decay. So if you declare an array of `int`, it decays to `int*`, but if you declare a string literal, it decays to `char* const*`, which means that the value is really an array of `n char const` (assuming `n` is a constant expression with value of `sizeof(char)` or a literal with value `sizeof(char)`), and if you dereference it to point into the string, it will point into that array, i.e. into a sequence
